

The Smarter Way to Plan for Long-Term Care

Protecting Lifestyle, Preserving Wealth, and Reducing Family Stress

Rob Cohen, CLTC, CPA

rob.cohen@ltc-associates.com

(610) 613-9594

About the Author:

Rob Cohen has spent his career helping people make thoughtful, informed decisions about long-term care—long before a crisis ever forces those decisions.

With more than 30 years of experience in the long-term care industry, Rob brings a rare combination of deep technical expertise and genuine empathy to his work. He has served in nearly every role imaginable—from advisor and national trainer to senior leadership positions at major long-term care insurance organizations. Along the way, he has helped thousands of individuals, families, and professionals understand how long-term care planning fits into a broader financial and lifestyle strategy.

What truly shapes Rob's approach, however, is not just professional experience—it's personal experience. Having been a caregiver to his own parents, Rob understands firsthand the emotional, financial, and relational impact that long-term care decisions can have on a family. That perspective informs every conversation he has with clients.

Rob believes long-term care planning isn't about fear or worst-case scenarios. It's about preserving independence, protecting the life you've worked hard to build, and reducing stress for the people you care about most. His goal is not to push a product, but to help people gain clarity—so they can make decisions confidently, on their own terms, and at the right time.

In addition to his advisory work, Rob has contributed to industry education and public awareness efforts, including testifying before the Pennsylvania State Senate on long-term care issues. He holds the designations of Certified Public Accountant (CPA) and Certified in Long-Term Care (CLTC), and he is licensed to work with clients across the country.

When he's not working with clients, Rob enjoys staying active, spending time with his children and grandchildren, and giving back to causes he cares about. He approaches both life and work with the same mindset: plan thoughtfully, stay engaged, and focus on what matters most.

If long-term care planning is something you've been meaning to explore, Rob welcomes the opportunity to have a thoughtful, pressure-free conversation about whether—and how—it fits into your life.

Contents

The Two Biggest Myths About Long-Term Care.....	3
What Almost Everyone Gets Wrong.....	3
The Real Cost of Long-Term Care—Now and in the Future	5
What Care Actually Costs (and Why It Keeps Rising).....	5
The Hidden Risks of “Self-Insuring” Long-Term Care	7
Why Paying Out of Pocket Isn’t as Simple as It Sounds.....	7
Why Long-Term Care Insurance Costs Less Than You Think	11
Understanding What You’re Really Paying For	11
Who Should—and Shouldn’t—Consider Long-Term Care Insurance	13
Is This in Your Financial Best Interest?	13
Health, Underwriting, and the Window of Opportunity.....	15
Why Qualifying Is Often the Biggest Risk	15
The Hidden Benefits Most People Never Consider.....	18
More Than Just Paying for Care.....	18
Family, Relationships, and the Cost No One Budgets For	21
The Impact on the People You Love Most.....	21
Understanding the Different Types of Long-Term Care Solutions	24
One Size Does Not Fit All	24
Why Working with an Experienced Specialist Makes the Difference	27
A Simple Summary and Final Perspective	29

The Two Biggest Myths About Long-Term Care

What Almost Everyone Gets Wrong

Most people delay long-term care planning for one simple reason: they believe they already know enough.

Unfortunately, what they “know” is usually based on two deeply ingrained myths—both of which can be financially damaging if left unchallenged.

These myths don’t come from irresponsibility. They come from outdated information, casual conversations, and assumptions that have never been tested against real numbers or situations.

Let’s address them directly.

Myth #1: “Long-Term Care Insurance Is Too Expensive”

This is the most common objection—and often the least examined.

When people say long-term care insurance is “too expensive,” they’re usually reacting to:

- A premium they heard about years ago
- A quick online quote without context
- A comparison to other insurance that doesn’t apply

What’s rarely considered is what the insurance is designed to protect.

Long-term care insurance isn’t protecting a car or a house. It protects:

- Retirement income
- Investment portfolios
- A spouse’s financial security
- The ability to make care decisions calmly, not under pressure

Mini Example:

A couple in their early 50s dismissed long-term care insurance after hearing it could cost “thousands per year.” Years later, when they finally reviewed real options, they were surprised to learn that properly designed coverage would have cost less annually than a summer vacation and far less than the portfolio withdrawals they would eventually face if care was needed.

Another reason this myth persists is that people assume long-term care insurance is a single, rigid product. In reality, there are multiple types of policies, funding approaches, and benefit structures—some designed for guaranteed lifetime premiums, others for limited pay periods or asset repositioning.

Myth #2: “Care Won’t Cost That Much”

This myth is even more dangerous.

People underestimate care costs because they:

- Think only of basic or short-term help
- Assume family will handle most of the care
- Don’t account for inflation
- Underestimate how long care lasts

There is a significant difference between occasional help and ongoing care.

Long-term care often means:

- Daily assistance
- Multiple caregivers
- Increasing needs over time
- Professional coordination

Mini Example:

What began as a few hours of weekly home care for one individual gradually turned into daily assistance, then overnight supervision. Within two years, monthly care costs exceeded what the family had budgeted for an entire year of retirement expenses.

Underestimating care costs leads people to overestimate how long their assets will last.

Why These Myths Persist

These two myths reinforce each other.

If insurance feels expensive, people assume they won’t need it.

If care feels affordable, insurance feels unnecessary.

But both beliefs are usually based on partial information.

The reality is:

- People often overestimate the cost of insurance
- And dramatically underestimate the cost of care

This disconnect is why long-term care planning deserves thoughtful evaluation—not avoidance.

To do that, we need to understand the real cost of care.

The Real Cost of Long-Term Care—Now and in the Future

What Care Actually Costs (and Why It Keeps Rising)

Long-term care is one of the most underestimated expenses in retirement.

Unlike travel, housing, or hobbies, care costs are:

- Difficult to predict
- Paid during times of emotional stress
- Often higher than expected

Understanding these costs is essential before deciding how—or whether—to insure against them.

What Long-Term Care Really Includes

Long-term care is not a single service. It's a continuum.

It may include:

- Assistance with bathing, dressing, or eating
- Supervision due to cognitive impairment
- Skilled nursing services
- Memory care support
- Long-term personal assistance

Care can take place:

- At home
- In assisted living
- In memory care
- In skilled nursing facilities

Most people move along this continuum rather than staying in one place.

Current Costs: A Reality Check

While costs vary by location and quality, certain patterns are consistent:

- Home care often costs thousands of dollars per month
- Assisted living can rival or exceed a second mortgage
- Skilled nursing care frequently reaches six figures per year
- Memory care typically costs more due to staffing and security needs

Mini Example:

After retirement, Linda planned to “just stay at home” if care was needed. After a fall, home care quickly escalated from part-time help to daily coverage. Linda’s family was shocked to discover that full-time home care cost more than a nearby assisted living facility—and neither option was covered by Medicare.

The Impact of Duration

One of the most overlooked factors is how long care can last.

Even a two- or three-year care event can:

- Significantly reduce a retirement portfolio
- Force increased withdrawals at the wrong time
- Change a surviving spouse's financial trajectory

Mini Example:

Mark and Debra planned on making 4% annual withdrawals to generate retirement income, but when Mark's care expenses were added, withdrawals doubled. Within a few years, Debra had to rethink housing, spending, and long-term plans.

The Role of Inflation

Healthcare costs rise faster than general inflation due to:

- Labor shortages
- Higher regulatory standards
- Increasing demand
- Specialized training requirements

Planning using today's numbers without inflation creates a false sense of safety.

What feels manageable today may be completely different in 10–20 years.

Why “I’ll Just Pay for It” Often Breaks Down

Many people assume they'll simply use savings or investments.

That approach can fail because:

- Care costs often start suddenly
- Assets may not be liquid
- Market conditions may be unfavorable for withdrawals
- Withdrawals may create tax issues
- A spouse may still need income for decades

Mini Example:

One family expected to use investment income to cover care. When care was needed during a market downturn, they were forced to sell assets at depressed values—locking in losses while expenses continued to rise.

Self-funding requires more than having money. It requires having the right money available at the right time.

How Cost Awareness Changes the Conversation

Once people understand the true cost of care, the discussion changes.

Long-term care insurance stops feeling like an expense and starts being evaluated as a tool to limit financial risk and exposure.

The key question becomes:

What risk am I trying to manage—and how efficiently can I do it?

That's where understanding insurance costs in proper context becomes essential.

And that's where we'll go next.

The Hidden Risks of “Self-Insuring” Long- Term Care

Why Paying Out of Pocket Isn’t as Simple as It Sounds

Many financially responsible people believe they can pay for long-term care themselves.

On the surface, this feels logical:

1. “We’ve saved.”
2. “We have investments.”
3. “We’ll use our assets if needed.”

For some families, self-funding may be viable. But for many, the risks are more complex than they first appear.

The question isn’t “Can I pay?”

It’s “What happens if I do?”

The Assumption: Assets Equal Certainty

When people say they will self-insure, they are typically assuming:

1. Investments will perform consistently
2. Care will be short-term
3. Withdrawals will not significantly impact lifestyle
4. Spouses and heirs will not be affected
5. Liquidating assets will be simple and timely

Each of these assumptions carries uncertainty.

Risk #1: Market Timing at the Worst Possible Moment

The future is unpredictable.

If care is needed during a market downturn, selling investments to fund care may lock in losses and permanently reduce retirement income.

Mini Example: The Down-Market

Kim and Raymond planned to draw from their investment portfolio if care was ever needed. When Ray required extended care during a market correction, the couple was forced to liquidate assets at depressed values—reducing not only their portfolio but also their income-generation. Care costs do not pause for market recovery.

Risk #2: The Duration Problem

Many people underestimate how long care can last.

Extended care over years can:

1. Deplete liquid assets
2. Force the sale of real estate
3. Disrupt income plans
4. Reduce a surviving spouse’s security

Risk #3: You Cannot Leverage Personal Assets at the Moment You Need Them

Insurance creates immediate leverage.

For every dollar of premium paid, multiple dollars of benefits may become available.

Personal savings do not multiply. Once care begins:

1. You are spending principal.
2. Investment growth may be interrupted.
3. Withdrawal rates may permanently increase.

Insurance Transfers Risk. Assets Absorb It.

Without leverage, every dollar spent on care is a dollar removed from your future options.

Risk #4: Emotional Decision-Making

When families self-fund without a defined plan, decisions are often made reactively:

1. “How much can we afford right now?”
2. “Should we reduce care to conserve assets?”
3. “Do we sell investments or real estate?”

These are not decisions most people want to make in the middle of a crisis.

A structured plan helps reduce emotional strain.

Risk #5: Overconfidence in Investment Returns

Relying on long-term average returns can be misleading.

Care expenses occur in real time.

Averages can mask sequence-of-returns risk—the order in which gains and losses occur—which is magnified if withdrawals are taken relatively early.

A More Balanced Perspective

The goal of long-term care planning is not necessarily to insure every dollar of potential expense.

Instead, it may be to:

1. Protect income streams
2. Cap exposure
3. Preserve a core portfolio
4. Reduce stress on loved ones
5. Add leverage when it matters most

Sometimes insurance complements personal assets rather than replaces them.

Why This Conversation Isn’t Just for the “Middle” — It Also Matters for the Ultra-Wealthy

Many assume long-term care planning is primarily a concern for those with modest assets.

But oftentimes, the greater one’s means, the greater their cost of care. It’s about maintaining a particular lifestyle, which, when an extended care element is layered on top, can far exceed averages.

These individuals value control, efficiency, and impact.

Wealth Does Not Eliminate Risk — It Changes the Type of Risk

High-net-worth families who could afford the high cost of care are instead concerned with how it would impact their broader long-range plans.

Even very large portfolios can be affected by:

1. Prolonged multi-year care events
2. Concentrated holdings or illiquid assets
3. Business ownership transitions
4. Estate equalization among heirs
5. Tax planning strategies

The question becomes less about whether you can write the checks — and more about whether you want to disrupt carefully structured plans to do so.

Mini Example: Concentrated Wealth, Limited Liquidity

An ultra-high-net-worth couple had significant real estate and private business interests. On paper, they had more than enough assets to self-fund care. But much of their wealth was illiquid. Funding extended care would have required selling assets at suboptimal times or disrupting estate transfer strategies.

Insurance was not about affordability. It was about maintaining flexibility.

Wealth Concentration Creates a Different Type of Exposure

High net worth does not always mean high liquidity.

Opportunity Cost Still Applies

Even for those with abundant resources, every dollar directed toward care is a dollar that:

1. Is no longer compounding
2. Is no longer invested
3. Is no longer positioned for generational transfer

4. May alter charitable or legacy objectives

For ultra-wealthy families, preserving investment strategy and estate planning continuity often becomes more important than the raw cost of care.

Insurance can function as a risk-transfer mechanism, protecting the broader financial architecture.

Privacy and Control Matter at Higher Asset Levels

Affluent families often place a premium on:

1. Maintaining discretion
2. Preserving lifestyle continuity
3. Avoiding financial disruption
4. Preventing public asset liquidation

Structured long-term care planning can provide a layer of predictability that supports these priorities.

This Is Not About “Need.” It’s About Optimization.

For affluent families, long-term care planning is often about efficiency, not survival.

The Question at Every Wealth Level

Whether someone has $1 million, $5 million, or $50 million, the core question is similar:

1. Do you want to absorb 100% of the risk personally?
2. Or do you want to strategically transfer some of that risk?

The decision is not about wealth status. It is about risk philosophy.

Bottom Line

Self-insuring long-term care is not simply a question of net worth.

It is a question of:

1. Liquidity
2. Timing
3. Duration
4. Market exposure
5. Estate impact
6. Family dynamics
7. Risk tolerance

Long-term care planning is not only for those who fear running out of money.

It is also for those who value preserving control, efficiency, and long-term strategy.

The right answer is not automatic.
But it should be intentional.

Why Long-Term Care Insurance Costs Less Than You Think

Understanding What You're Really Paying For

Once people understand the true cost of long-term care, the next question is inevitable:

“If care is that expensive, why doesn’t insurance cost even more?”

The answer lies in how long-term care insurance actually works—and what it’s designed to do.

Insurance Is About Risk Transfer, Not Prepayment

A common misunderstanding is that long-term care insurance is meant to “pay back” every dollar you put into it.

That’s not its purpose.

Long-term care insurance is designed to:

- Transfer a large, unpredictable financial risk
- Create leverage using pooled resources
- Limit the impact of a high-cost, low-probability event

You’re not prepaying for care—you’re protecting against financial disruption.

The value wasn’t in “getting the money back.” The value was in avoiding a much larger loss.

Why Premiums Feel High—But Often Aren’t

Insurance premiums feel expensive because they are:

- Highly visible
- Paid before benefits are needed
- Paid with after-tax dollars

Care costs, on the other hand:

- Are often underestimated
- Feel hypothetical
- Are mentally deferred to the future

This mismatch skews perception.

Annual Premium vs. Annual Care Cost

- Typical insurance premium: A predictable annual expense
- Typical care cost: A potentially six-figure annual exposure
-

Insurance replaces uncertainty with structure.

Age and Health Matter—More Than People Realize

Two factors drive long-term care insurance pricing more than anything else:

1. Age when you apply
2. Health when you apply

Waiting doesn't just increase premiums—it could eliminate options entirely.

Mini Example: The Cost of Waiting

Scott and Brian, both age 50, discussed long-term care planning. Scott moved forward. Brian decided to “revisit it later.” Five years later, Brian developed a manageable—but underwritable—health condition. Coverage was still available, but at a higher cost and with fewer choices. The delay didn't just increase premiums—it reduced flexibility.

The Window of Opportunity

Long-term care planning is most efficient when:

- Health is stable
- Income is strong
- Choices are broad
- Decisions are made calmly

Once health changes, options narrow quickly.

Modern Policies Offer More Flexibility Than Most People Expect

Many people picture long-term care insurance as:

- Pay forever
- Use it or lose it
- No guarantees

That perception is outdated. Today's solutions include:

- Limited pay options (paying over 10 years, 20 years, or as a single premium)
- Hybrid policies that combine life insurance or annuities with long-term care benefits
- Return-of-premium or death benefit features
- Inflation protection options

Traditional vs. Hybrid Solutions

Feature	Traditional LTC	Hybrid / Asset-Based
Premium Structure	Ongoing or limited pay	Lump sum or limited pay
Death Benefit	No	Yes
Leverage on Dollars	High	Moderate
Flexibility	High	High

No option is universally better—the value depends on goals and preferences.

Next, we'll address the most important question of all:

Is long-term care insurance in your financial best interest—or not?

Preview of What Comes Next

- Who typically benefits most from long-term care insurance
- When self-funding may make sense
- How lifestyle, assets, and income shape the right decision

Who Should—and Shouldn't—Consider Long-Term Care Insurance

Is This in Your Financial Best Interest?

Long-term care insurance is not for everyone.

That may sound surprising coming from an industry professional, but it's an important truth. The value of long-term care planning lies in alignment—between financial resources, health, lifestyle goals, and risk tolerance.

The goal of this chapter is not to persuade you one way or another. It's to help you determine whether long-term care insurance deserves serious consideration in your situation.

The Real Question You're Answering

The decision is often framed incorrectly.

It's not:

“Do I need long-term care insurance?”

It's:

“If I need extended care, how do I plan to fund it?”

Insurance is simply one of several tools available.

Who Typically Benefits Most from Long-Term Care Insurance

People who benefit most from long-term care insurance often share several characteristics.

1. You Have Assets to Protect

A significant portion of net worth earmarked for:

- Retirement income
- A surviving spouse
- Legacy or charitable goals

2. You Want to Preserve Lifestyle and Choice

Insurance is less about whether care can be afforded and more about how care is received.

Coverage can:

- Expand care options
- Allow care at home longer
- Reduce compromises driven by cost
- Support higher-quality facilities

Mini Example

One family assumed adult children would coordinate care if needed. When the time came, competing careers, distance, and emotional stress made caregiving far more difficult than expected. Financial planning could not replace emotional strain—but it could have reduced it.

3. You are Financially Comfortable—But Not Care-Proof

Many people fall into a middle ground:

- Too affluent to rely on public assistance
- Not wealthy enough to absorb extended care without consequences

This group often gains the most from risk transfer.

Financial Position	Common Strategy
Limited assets	Public assistance
Moderate to high assets	Risk transfer or blended strategies
Ultra-high net worth	Self-funding with contingency planning

Most people fall into the middle category.

When Long-Term Care Insurance May Not Be the Best Fit

Just as important as knowing when insurance helps is knowing when it may not.

1. You Can Easily Self-Fund Care Without Compromise

If extended care expenses would not materially impact:

- Your lifestyle
- A spouse's security
- Long-term financial goals

Then insurance may offer limited value.

2. You Are Uninsurable or Have Significant Health Limitations

Health underwriting matters.

In some cases:

- Coverage may be unavailable
- Costs may outweigh benefits

Understanding this early is critical.

Health Is a Planning Variable

Health doesn't just affect pricing—it affects eligibility and options.

Looking Ahead

In the next chapter, we'll explore one of the most underestimated aspects of long-term care planning:

How health and underwriting can quietly determine whether you have options—or not.

Health, Underwriting, and the Window of Opportunity

Why Qualifying Is Often the Biggest Risk

When people think about long-term care planning, they usually focus on cost.

What they overlook is something far more important:

Health determines whether planning is even possible.

Unlike auto or homeowners insurance, long-term care insurance requires medical underwriting. That means eligibility is not guaranteed—and the window to qualify can close quietly and unexpectedly.

How Underwriting Really Works

Underwriting is the process insurers use to evaluate risk. It typically includes:

- Health questionnaires
- Prescription history reviews
- Medical records
- Sometimes cognitive or functional assessments

The goal isn't perfection. It's determining whether an applicant meets the insurer's current guidelines.

Many people assume underwriting only matters if they're already unhealthy. In reality, small and manageable conditions can significantly affect eligibility.

Mini Example: "I'm Basically Healthy"

A 58-year-old professional considered himself healthy—active, working full-time, and independent. He delayed applying for coverage because he “felt fine.” A routine medical visit revealed a cognitive concern that required follow-up. Coverage was no longer available, even though daily life hadn't changed.

Health changes don't have to be dramatic to affect insurability.

Common Conditions That Affect Eligibility

Underwriting guidelines vary, but common red flags may include:

- Cognitive concerns or memory-related diagnoses
- Certain neurological conditions
- Advanced diabetes complications
- Mobility limitations
- History of strokes or serious cardiac events

Some conditions don't cause automatic declines—but they may:

- Increase cost
- Limit benefit options
- Postpone coverage

Health Is Not Binary

Underwriting isn't just "approved" or "declined."

It's a spectrum of outcomes.

Why Waiting Is Riskier Than Most People Realize

People often delay planning because:

- They feel healthy
- They want to revisit the decision later
- Other financial priorities feel more urgent

But health does not move on a predictable timeline.

Mini Example: The Five-Year Difference

Two individuals, both age 55, explored long-term care planning. One applied and secured coverage. The other postponed. Five years later, the second individual developed a manageable chronic condition. Coverage was still possible—but at a significantly higher cost and with reduced benefits.

The difference wasn't age alone—it was timing.

The "Healthy Enough, Not Wealthy Enough" Gap

Many people fall into a dangerous middle zone:

- They are healthy today
- They are not wealthy enough to absorb extended care comfortably
- They assume they can plan later

This group is often the most vulnerable to losing options.

Health Status	Financial Capacity	Planning Impact
Good	Moderate	Ideal planning window
Good	High	Flexible options
Declining	Moderate	Limited choices
Declining	Low	Few or no options

Planning is most effective in the top rows—not the bottom ones.

Why Early Planning Preserves Leverage

Applying while healthy provides:

- More policy options
- Better pricing
- Greater benefit flexibility
- More favorable underwriting outcomes

It also allows planning to be done calmly—without pressure from an immediate need.

Planning Is Easier Than Crisis

Decisions made early are strategic.
Decisions made during health changes are reactive.

Why Many People Never Get a Second Chance

Once certain conditions appear in medical records, they don't go away.

Even if symptoms improve:

- Medical history remains
- Prescriptions remain
- Underwriting guidelines remain

This is why many people say, “I wish I had done this earlier.”

Mini Example: A Closed Door

A couple in their early 60s planned to revisit long-term care insurance after retirement. Before they did, one spouse was diagnosed with a neurological condition. Suddenly, the discussion wasn't about cost or benefits—it was about whether any options remained at all.

Why a Professional Review Matters

Health underwriting is nuanced.

A knowledgeable professional can:

- Identify potential red flags before applying
- Suggest timing strategies

- Help choose carriers with appropriate guidelines
- Avoid unnecessary declines on record
- Structure applications strategically

This guidance can make the difference between approval and rejection.

Looking Ahead

In the next chapter, we'll explore benefits most people never factor into their decision making—advantages that go beyond paying for care and affect taxes, retirement confidence, and family security.

The Hidden Benefits Most People Never Consider

More Than Just Paying for Care

When people evaluate long-term care insurance, they usually focus on one question:

“Will this policy pay for care if I need it?”

That’s an important question—but it’s not the only one that matters.

Long-term care planning affects far more than care expenses. When designed properly, it can influence taxes, retirement confidence, family dynamics, and even how long assets are able to last.

These secondary benefits are often the reason people ultimately decide to move forward.

Tax Advantages: Often Overlooked, Sometimes Significant

Depending on how coverage is structured and how premiums are paid, long-term care insurance may offer tax advantages.

Potential benefits can include:

- Deductibility of premiums (subject to limits and circumstances)
- Tax-free payment of qualified benefits
- Favorable treatment when combined with certain asset strategies

Tax rules vary and should always be reviewed with a qualified advisor, but ignoring tax implications can lead to incomplete analysis.

Mini Example: After-Tax Perspective

A business owner initially focused on the gross premium amount. After evaluating the after-tax cost and potential tax-free benefits, the net cost was far lower than expected. The decision became less about expense and more about efficiency.

Always Compare After-Tax Costs

A dollar paid in premium is not always equal to a dollar withdrawn from a taxable portfolio.

Longevity Benefits: Protecting a Longer Life

We are living longer—often with extended periods of good health followed by compressed years of care.

This creates a planning paradox:

- Longevity is a gift
- Longevity also increases the likelihood of needing care

Long-term care planning helps address this risk without requiring excessive conservatism in retirement spending.

The Survivor's Reality

Long-term care often affects one spouse. The financial impact affects both.

Spousal Protection: The Often Unspoken Concern

For married couples, long-term care planning is rarely about both spouses needing care at the same time.

It's about:

- Protecting the healthy spouse
- Preserving income streams
- Preventing lifestyle disruption

Without planning, one spouse's care can permanently alter the other's financial future.

Mini Example: Income Preservation

A couple planned retirement income assuming both Social Security and pension income would continue. When care costs were introduced into the model, it became clear that the surviving spouse's income would be dramatically reduced without insurance. Coverage helped preserve independence.

Family Relationship Benefits

Reducing Emotional and Financial Strain

Long-term care doesn't just affect finances—it affects families.

Without a plan:

- Adult children may step into caregiving roles unexpectedly
- Family members may disagree about care decisions
- Emotional stress can amplify financial strain

Planning ahead helps set expectations and reduce conflict.

Mini Example: Avoiding Family Conflict

One family faced difficult decisions about care placement. With limited financial flexibility, emotions ran high and there was arguing between family members. Another family, with a clear care plan in place, was able to focus on support rather than logistics. The difference wasn't love—it was preparation.

Dignity, Independence, and Control

This is one of the most personal benefits—and one of the hardest to quantify.

Planning can help ensure:

- Care is received in preferred settings
- Decisions are made intentionally
- Independence is preserved as long as possible
- Personal values are respected

Control Is a Form of Wealth

Financial resources create options.

Planning ensures those options are available when needed.

Peace of Mind: The Benefit People Feel Most

While premiums are paid annually, peace of mind is experienced daily.

People often report:

- Reduced anxiety about the future
- Increased confidence in retirement decisions
- Relief from uncertainty

This emotional benefit is difficult to measure—but deeply felt.

Mini Example: Emotional Relief

A couple described their decision as “checking a box we kept avoiding.” Once the plan was in place, the topic stopped hanging over them. They didn’t think about the policy often—but they valued knowing it was there.

Why These Benefits Are Often Missed

Many people evaluate long-term care insurance using the same framework they use for auto or home insurance.

That framework is too narrow.

Long-term care planning touches:

- Retirement income
- Family dynamics
- Tax efficiency
- Lifestyle choices
- Emotional well-being

Ignoring these factors often leads to incomplete decisions.

What This Chapter Is Really Saying

Long-term care insurance is not just about paying for care.

It’s about:

- Protecting independence
- Preserving relationships
- Supporting a longer, fuller life
- Reducing uncertainty for everyone involved

For many people, these benefits—not the policy itself—are what make planning worthwhile.

Looking Ahead

In the next chapter, we’ll examine how long-term care planning affects family relationships more deeply—and why this aspect is often underestimated until it’s too late.

Family, Relationships, and the Cost No One Budgets For

The Impact on the People You Love Most

Long-term care is often framed as a personal financial issue. In reality, it's a family issue.

When care is needed, it rarely affects just one person. It affects spouses, children, siblings, and sometimes even grandchildren. The financial cost is only part of the burden—the emotional and relational costs are often greater.

The Invisible Price of Unplanned Care

Most families do not budget for long-term care because they don't know how to.

Care expenses are:

- Unpredictable
- Irregular
- Often urgent
- Emotionally charged

But beyond the financial impact, unplanned care introduces stress at the worst possible time.

Mini Example: Crisis Mode

A family received a call that care was needed immediately. With no plan in place, decisions were rushed. Disagreements arose over care location, affordability, and responsibility. The stress didn't come from lack of love—it came from lack of preparation.

The Role Adult Children Often Play— Unexpectedly

Many people assume adult children will “help out” if needed.

What's often overlooked is what that help actually entails:

- Time away from work
- Career disruption
- Emotional strain
- Financial contribution
- Geographic challenges

The Caregiver Reality

Most family caregivers do not plan to become caregivers.

They step in because there is no alternative.

Caregiving is rarely a short-term commitment.

Mini Example: The Career Impact

An adult daughter reduced work hours to help coordinate care for a parent. What began as temporary support lasted years. Lost income, delayed retirement savings, and chronic stress followed—none of which were anticipated.

Spouses: The Most Affected—and Least Discussed

For married couples, long-term care often becomes a single-spouse issue with shared consequences.

The healthy spouse may face:

- Reduced income
- Increased responsibilities
- Emotional exhaustion
- Social isolation
- Long-term financial insecurity

Mini Example: The Survivor's Burden

One spouse required extended care. The other managed finances, visits, and decisions while trying to maintain a normal life. By the time care ended, the surviving spouse's financial and emotional resources were depleted—changing the course of retirement permanently.

How Money Pressure Affects Relationships

When finances are strained:

- Tensions rise
- Communication breaks down
- Decisions feel forced
- Guilt becomes part of the process

Even close families can struggle when money becomes the limiting factor.

Planning Reduces Conflict

Clear financial plans don't eliminate emotion—but they reduce friction.

Why Planning Is an Act of Consideration

Long-term care planning is often viewed as self-protection.

In reality, it's also a gift to others.

Planning can:

- Clarify expectations
- Reduce burden on loved ones
- Prevent difficult financial conversations
- Allow family members to focus on support, not logistics

Mini Example: A Different Experience

One family had a care plan in place, including funding and preferences. When care was needed, decisions were made calmly. Family members focused on quality time—not cost calculations. The difference was preparation.

The Emotional Toll of Uncertainty

Even before care is needed, uncertainty can affect relationships.

Questions linger:

- “What will happen if something goes wrong?”
- “Who will be responsible?”
- “Can we afford this?”

Avoiding the topic doesn't make it go away—it just postpones clarity.

Reframing the Decision

Long-term care planning is not about assuming the worst.

It's about:

- Protecting relationships
- Preserving dignity
- Supporting independence
- Reducing unnecessary stress

Many people who move forward do so less for themselves—and more for the people they care about.

What This Chapter Is Really About

This chapter isn't meant to be emotional—it's meant to be honest.

Long-term care touches families in ways spreadsheets can't capture. While no plan removes all difficulty, having a plan can dramatically reduce unnecessary hardship.

Looking Ahead

In the next chapter, we'll take a practical turn and look at the different types of long-term care solutions available—and how their benefits and trade-offs compare.

Understanding the Different Types of Long-Term Care Solutions

One Size Does Not Fit All

Once people decide that long-term care planning deserves attention, the next challenge is understanding the options.

There isn't just one type of long-term care insurance—and there isn't just one way to plan for care. Each approach has its own benefits, trade-offs, and ideal use cases.

The right solution depends less on the product and more on how it fits into your overall financial picture.

The Three Primary Planning Approaches

Most long-term care strategies fall into one of three categories:

1. Traditional long-term care insurance
2. Hybrid or asset-based solutions
3. Self-funding with contingency planning

Each addresses the same risk—but in very different ways.

Traditional Long-Term Care Insurance

Maximum Leverage for Care Costs

Traditional long-term care insurance is designed specifically to pay for care services.

Key Features:

- Premiums paid over time (or sometimes limited pay)
- Benefits triggered by qualifying care needs
- Broad flexibility in care settings
- Typically, the highest leverage per premium dollar

Mini Example: Leveraging Premium Dollars

An individual focused on protecting retirement income chose traditional coverage. The premium represented a small percentage of annual income, while the benefit provided several times that amount in potential care coverage.

Trade-Offs to Consider

- Premiums may increase over time
- No death benefit if care is never needed
- Requires health underwriting

Best Fit

Traditional long-term care insurance often works best for people who:

- Want maximum care leverage
 - Are comfortable with insurance-based risk transfer
 - Prioritize flexibility in care delivery
-

Hybrid / Asset-Based Long-Term Care Solutions

Insurance with Built-In Guarantees

Hybrid solutions combine long-term care benefits with life insurance or annuities.

These policies are often funded with:

- A lump sum
- A limited number of payments

If care is needed, funds are used for care. If care is not needed, a death benefit or remaining value passes to beneficiaries.

Mini Example: Repositioning Assets

A couple moved funds from a low-yield account into a hybrid policy. The assets gained a new purpose—providing either care benefits or a guaranteed legacy—without increasing ongoing expenses.

Trade-Offs to Consider

- Lower leverage than traditional long-term care insurance
- Higher upfront cost
- Less flexibility in some care scenarios

Feature	Traditional LTC	Hybrid / Asset-Based
Primary Purpose	Care coverage	Care or legacy
Premium Style	Ongoing or limited	Lump sum / limited
Use-It-or-Lose-It	Yes	No
Care Leverage	Higher	Moderate
Guarantees	Fewer	More

Best Fit

Hybrid solutions often work best for people who:

- Dislike “use-it-or-lose-it” insurance
 - Have idle or conservative assets
 - Value guarantees and legacy protection
-

Self-Funding with Contingency Planning

Paying from Personal Assets

Some individuals choose to self-fund care using savings, investments, or income.

This approach relies on:

- Asset availability
- Market conditions
- Timing

Mini Example: When Self-Funding Works

An individual with substantial liquid assets and no dependents chose to self-fund. A contingency plan was documented to ensure liquidity and minimize disruption if care was needed.

Trade-Offs to Consider

- No risk transfer
- Full exposure to care inflation
- Potential impact on spouse or heirs
- Requires disciplined planning

Why Product Selection Comes After Strategy

Many people start by shopping for policies.

This often leads to confusion and frustration.

A better approach is:

1. Clarify goals
2. Evaluate financial exposure
3. Assess health eligibility
4. Select the strategy that aligns best

Strategy First

The best product is the one that fits your life—not the one with the best headline numbers.

Looking Ahead

In the next chapter, we'll focus on how these solutions are customized—because design details often matter more than the type of policy itself.

Why Working with an Experienced Specialist Makes the Difference

Clarity, Strategy, and Better Outcomes

By now, you understand that long-term care planning involves real, financial, health, and family consequences.

The remaining question is not whether planning matters.

It's how to make the right decision—and who should help you make it.

Long-term care planning is not a simple insurance purchase. It is a strategic decision that benefits from experience, judgment, and foresight.

Long-Term Care Planning Is Not a DIY Decision

Unlike most financial decisions:

- Health underwriting determines whether options exist at all
- Policy design choices may be permanent
- Mistakes often don't show up until decades later
- Few professionals truly specialize in this area

An experienced specialist helps you navigate these complexities before they become costly problems.

Experience Helps Preserve Options

One of the most important roles of a specialist is protecting your ability to qualify.

This includes:

- Identifying potential underwriting concerns early
- Understanding how different carriers view medical history
- Structuring applications strategically
- Avoiding unnecessary declines that can limit future options

Timing and Strategy Matter

The right guidance early can mean the difference between approval, limited options, or no options at all.

Specialists Design Strategies, Not Just Policies

There is no single “best” long-term care solution.

A specialist helps design a plan around:

- Lifestyle and care preferences
- Income and asset protection goals
- Risk tolerance and comfort with uncertainty
- Legacy and family considerations

This design-first approach ensures coverage fits your life—not a generic template.

Planning Should Support Your Bigger Financial Picture

Long-term care planning works best when integrated with:

- Retirement income strategy
- Tax considerations
- Spousal planning
- Estate and legacy goals

An experienced specialist considers how long-term care decisions interact with the rest of your financial life.

Reducing Family Stress Is a Key Benefit

A well-structured plan does more than protect money.

It:

- Reduces uncertainty for a spouse
- Limits emotional and financial strain on children
- Creates clarity during already difficult situations
- Preserves dignity and control

The Value of a Professional Consultation

A consultation with a specialist is not a commitment. It is an opportunity for clarity.

It allows you to:

- Determine whether long-term care planning makes sense for you
- Understand realistic options based on your health and finances
- Identify risks and opportunities early
- Decide with confidence—or decide to wait intentionally

Confidence From Understanding

Better information leads to better decisions.

The Bottom Line

Long-term care planning is too important to approach casually.

Working with an experienced specialist helps you:

- Avoid common mistakes
- Preserve options
- Design smarter strategies
- Align decisions with what matters most

The best time to seek guidance is before a decision is forced.

Your Next Step

If long-term care planning is on your mind—even in the background—it's worth a professional conversation.

That conversation can provide clarity, confidence, and direction, whether you act now or later.

Intentional decisions today create better outcomes tomorrow.

A Simple Summary and Final Perspective

What Matters Most

Long-term care planning is not about assuming the worst.

It's about:

- Preserving independence
- Protecting retirement income
- Supporting family relationships
- Maintaining control over future decisions

Most people don't plan because they think they have plenty of time.

Many later discover they waited too long.

Key Takeaways

- Care costs are higher than most expect
- Insurance often costs less than assumed
- Health and timing determine available options
- Planning reduces financial and emotional stress
- The right solution is personal—not generic

The Real Advantage

Planning early doesn't force a decision—it gives you better ones.

Final Thought...

You've worked hard to build your lifestyle and financial security.

Long-term care planning helps protect what you've already earned.

The most important step is simple:

Have a conversation while you still have choices.

That conversation can bring clarity, confidence, and peace of mind—whether you move forward with insurance, a hybrid strategy, or another approach entirely.

A Message from Rob...

I hope you've found this eBook informative and valuable. Please reach out any time with feedback, questions or to take the next step in your planning journey.

Rob Cohen, CLTC, CPA

rob.cohen@ltc-associates.com

(610) 613-9594